

Windhover

A Journal of Christian Literature

Windhover

A Journal of Christian Literature

Spring 2013

Volume 17

Windhover

A Journal of Christian Literature

Volume 17 • Spring 2013

Editor

Nathaniel L. Hansen

Contributing Editors

Joe R. Christopher

William Jolliff

Michael H. Lythgoe

Yvonne Schultz

Print Coordinator

Randy Yandell

Student Assistant

Laura Phipps

Cover: i7 (interventions series)
by Micah Bloom © 2012

Copyright © 2013

University of Mary Hardin-Baylor Press
Dr. Randy O'Rear, President & CEO
Belton, Texas

Contents

Foreword

Douglas G. Campbell
Aftereffect	1
Michael H. Lythgoe
Liturgy of the Hours, Southwest	2
Maryanne Hannan
Concert	4
Chet Corey
Angels in Death Spirals	5
Micah Bloom
Artwork	6
Michael H. Lythgoe
Interventions: The Art of Micah Bloom.....	10
Robert B. Moreland
No Plan B	12
Maryanne Hannan
Wings.....	13
Chet Corey
Cain's Wife	14
Joe R. Christopher
The Decision.....	16
Jennifer Clark
Grieving The God of My Youth	17
Max Harris
First Blood	18
Michael D. Riley
Pilate's Clothes	22

Chritopher Fahy
Iscariot (from Matthew)	23
Aaron Brown
Taking Communion with Goldfish.....	24
Nathaniel A. Schmidt
The Converts.....	25
Jennifer Clark
I Want a Church	26
Brian Rutenberg
Artwork	27
Michael H. Lythgoe
Ecstasy in The Lowcountry:
On Brian Rutenberg's Paintings.....	31
Aaron Brown
Evacuation Ebenezer.....	36
Sally Clark
Shooting Craps	38
Michael D. Riley
A Prayer to Pray Again	39
Sally Clark
The Widow's Mite	40
Kelley White
(the stones I chose, the stones I lost).....	41
Michael H. Lythgoe
Ranchos de Taos	42
Michael D. Riley
In Memoriam	43
Greg Spencer
The Summer of My Gathering Mortality	44

Douglas G. Campbell
Muscle-Bound	45
Sally Clark
Prayer in Public Schools	46
Maryanne Hannan
Pact.....	47
Kelley White
Report (CY47)	48
Jennifer Clark
When God Chuckles in Your Bones.....	49
Paul Michael Garrison
The Pet	50
Sister Kate Martin
Vanishing.....	56
Michael H. Lythgoe
Santo Bulto	57
Greg Spencer
On the news of Connie's near-passing.....	58
Michael D. Riley
A Prayer for First Light	59
Michael H. Lythgoe
review of Every Riven Thing by Christian Wiman	60
review of A God in the House: Poets Talk about Faith by Ilya Kaminsky and Katerine Towler, eds	63
Contributors	66
Submission and Subscription Information	70
Invitation to Writers' Festival	72

Douglas G. Campbell

Aftereffect

Early this morning when the moon looked like a cotton ball in the dark sky and trees were merely thick or thin lines scrawled upon dark blue paper, the robins, towhees and other birds were crazy with song.

The recent sunny interlude amidst a string of gray rain-filled days has jolted and jostled almost every living thing into some kind of near ecstasy. Perhaps that's the way it should be on the Monday after Easter.

The universe is not quite ready to revert back to the normal routine, the crushing lethargy or the everyday sequence of events.
Energy or electricity still pulses through all who would open themselves to a transcendent promise.

Chet Corey

Angels in Death Spirals

Angels in death spirals
who in their diving know they cannot die pull up at Mach 2, corkscrew off into shrouded cloud,
sunlight shawling through like holy linen of Turin.
They who have studied the dalliance of eagles and swept-wing fighters that flame out somersault like the clash of cymbals at a Sommerfest, enraptured at their free-fall into our fallen, earthborn bodies.

Max Harris

First Blood

After eight days had passed, it was time to circumcise the child.
Luke 2:21

When I awake, I am still with you.

I was crying when I fell asleep, riddled with hiccups, the aftershocks of howling. Now my eyes are swollen, sore, but I can smell your scent of passion and sour milk. I can feel your arms around me, my slight weight filling them, perhaps, with pins and needles.

The darkness cannot hide me. Your lips can find my soft skin anywhere. They rest against my forehead, walk the rounded distance downward to my ear. They nibble on my skin. You're tired from all the pain already, but you tell me in a whisper you delight in me. You are young. Your breath is like apples.

You taste my eyelids with your tongue. At first, they feel like fresh grapes, but the corners sting, sour, with salt. It breaks your heart when I cry. You feel as though you've let me down. You wish you could devour my pain.

We're not alone.

Your husband sleeps. His calloused hands are stained with resin. His knives rest, sheathed, beside his bed. His mallet dangles from a slanted peg. He thought he might find makeshift work.

A drunkard slurs his winter song outside. He starts again. Again, but farther off. You must be cold.

Your husband wasn't there the night I slipped inside you like a shaft of sunlight, warming your bed. You were frightened at first, protesting your innocence ("How can this be?"), but you yielded quickly, celebrating flesh and things turned upside down. An end to disembodied words, you thought.

Before the dawn, you fled your husband's anger, scudding, like a fishing boat before the wind. The stars dimmed. Storm clouds, you were certain, gathered at your back. Ahead of you, your long dress billowed like a nine-month belly. Already you loved me.

You climbed the rising waves of vineyards and stone walls. You hid from shepherds, slipped on sheep shit. Inchng sunrise gave back color to the earth's cheeks. Pools turned rippled pink, their surface closing over small frogs. Tufts of wild flowers peeked from crevices. A flock of long-haired goats rang bells like priests. You slowed. The steady pattern of your steps had calmed you. In an elbow of the path, you stopped to see you weren't pursued.

A lark soared, sprinkling you with song. You stood, your head back, bathing in the liquid air. Perhaps the lowly rise like larks, you thought.

You clambered zigzag up the path, your young legs strong again. You helped yourself to ears of barley, rubbing chaff from kernel in your hand.

You told your cousin, in the hills, "He fills the hungry with good things."

"Doesn't he!" she said. She was in her sixth month then, the baby kicking like a hare.

She wrapped her arms around you, comforting. She'd long ago turned gray. Her husband smiled, but didn't say a word. He heated bowls of lentil stew and cracked a loaf of bread.

You stayed three months. Her belly grew. You helped to cook the meals. You milked the gravy-colored cow. You cooled your cousin's brow with soft, moist cloths. She asked you, please, to cut back on the spices. Garlic made her belch, she said, like an old drunk crone. She talked of love, the miracles of pleasure and the splinting of the heart. She giggled like the girl you are. You laughed with her.

Your husband tracked you down. Where else could you have gone? He looked at you, bereaved. He murmured of divorce. "A quiet one," he said. "No fuss."

You let him stay. He built a cradle for your cousin's child. The boy had lungs like bellows, heating coals to flame by howling, keeping villages awake. You trembled at his circumcision. In the moonlight, shawms and tabors beckoned guests to dance. The baby's father launched into a song, his old voice echoing around the hills. You leaned across the table to your husband and you said you'd go with him. He nodded.

You left in early morning light and silence. Terraced fields beside the path were summer dry. A fox ran lightfoot through the grape vines, sweeping dust. You felt like you were climbing down inside a failed well.

Your neighbors looked at you askance. Your husband ate his meals in sullen shame. He wouldn't touch you, even in the dark. You huddled in your bed, alone. You thought of me. I scared you sometimes.

Then, one otherwise dull afternoon, you dared to paint yourself with henna and a splash of spikenard.

“Who’s it for?” he said.

“For you,” you said.

He wasn’t sure. He laid his head against your belly and he wept. You touched the surface of his hair. He pulled away.

But, later, he forgave you. Holding you, he said of me, “I dreamed of him. I know his name.” You picked the splinters from his beard. You licked your finger and you laid it gently on his parched lips.

And, now, he’s brought us where his people once had roots. We came two weeks ago. The town’s so crowded. Even poverty costs more here. Tired from looking after us, he snores.

The three of us slipped out today. I saw the foreign soldiers, standing in pairs at street corners, cradling their weapons. They’re farther from home than we are. They think they rule the world: their name is legion. But, they didn’t hurt me. Bundled underneath a blanket, nose to the wind, I smelled charcoal, grease, and roasting birds.

A beggar rubbed his eyes with cracked, unbending knuckles, but it didn’t help. He couldn’t see. Your husband bent to give the man some bread. He stayed a while to keep the dogs from stealing it.

The foreign soldiers are afraid of terrorists. Religion makes men mad.

We stepped inside a courtyard, stooping through a crumbling archway. Crows picked flecks of skin from cracks between the cobblestones. I smelled the cry of blood. A circle of men stood, parsing laws, around a brazier. They groomed their beards with crusted fingers. You were the only woman. You unwrapped me. I saw the knife.

In the thin darkness, I search for your breasts, my fists flailing until I feel the cotton that covers your flesh. I turn my head, sucking on air. You loosen your dress, parting its tucks like petals. I root like a piglet. Amused, exhausted, you find and feed me your nipple.

I grunt, but you’re kind. “Poor little calf,” you say.

There are few comforts. My lips against your breast (like leavened bread), my moist tongue against your nipple (like a sun-dried cherry), and the quenching of my infant thirst are three. The cow’s warm breath is another. But, the straw scratches and the shit chafes. In the corners of the shed, I hear rats scamper, their ears like shoe leather and their tails like laces.

My limbs are knit together like a scarf.

Today, I screamed. I feared my flesh would unravel at a slice. The man with the knife made me bleed, but only a little. Millions have suffered the same indignity. I must learn to be quiet.

A stone knife is like a hand-held altar. I have only lost a tiny flap of flesh. I was given a name. Your husband caught his breath.

My glans looks like the uncooked kidney of a pigeon and my piss stings.

I open my eyes. The stars outside are scattered like frost on black earth. The angels have fled, sucked back into the sky like dust.

Michael D. Riley

Pilate's Clothes

How modern he seems. “What is truth?”
His wife and her dreams, his evasions and sarcasm, his sad celebrity.
“Don’t you know who I am?”

The water like liquid silver in the silver bowl, his empty hands above it, their own reflection dancing in the silver waves.

Divided by the dice, the soldiers resurrect his clothes onto their own backs, hang them from wooden hooks on the barrack’s doors,
the seamless tunic and royal purple cloak special prizes with higher stakes.
Did they feel the man slip through the arm holes with them, listening to the crude jokes, rinsing the blood out.
Who knows what cloth contains.
Or withholds. The old rumors must have tingled their skin some mornings, themselves dead men rising,
barely alive to the same old duties,
the fibers scraping their arms like the first warm sunshine.

While Pilate late at night beside a tripod throwing shadows on the wall feels amid the same rumors an old dampness between his fingers, and walks out—not for the first time—onto the portico, wearing the dead air around him, praying for one more anesthetic wind from the west to put on through another endless morning.

Sally Clark

Prayer in Public Schools

The holiest place to be in gym class is here at the end of the line where prayers are fervent for the bell to ring early,
allowing an escape, or for a fire to break out in the locker room, or perhaps for the chin-up bar to unfasten from the wall and fall with a thunderous bolt, breaking into two pieces like the parting of scarlet waters, a sign from above that the weak and the overweight might still someday inherit the earth.

Sister Kate Martin

Vanishing

She is fragile, vulnerable as glass, age has lightened her very bones.

Her mind, too, is lighter:
the weight of years drifts away before she realizes what is lost.
She mourns absences she cannot name.

Where have her memories gone,
the child-rearing, householding, church-going?
She wove a dense dream of family only to see time whip it from her hand.

Our hands are what she must hold now, lightly, before she, too, slips away,
vanishing.

Windhover

A Journal of Christian Literature

Volume 17 • Spring 2013

CONTRIBUTORS

Micah Bloom

Max Harris

Aaron Brown

Michael Hugh Lythgoe

Douglas G. Campbell

Sister Kate Martin

Joe R. Christopher

Robert B. Moreland

Jennifer Clark

Michael D. Riley

Sally Clark

Brian Rutenberg

Chet Corey

Nathaniel A. Schmidt

Christopher Fahy

Greg Spencer

Paul Michael Garrison

Kelley White

Maryanne Hannan